Risk Management Requirements for Returning to Work

As we begin to see the Covid-19 restrictions lifted, buildings and facilities will open up again to the public. For businesses forced to close their doors, furlough staff or have staff working from home, it is now essential to start planning a strategy for getting back to business.

The route back to work during the current situation is likely to be different for everyone. As a result, reopening can present hazards which if not properly managed, can result in damage, injury and legal action causing further disruption to your business.

Our Risk Management service can give you the tools and guides to help get up and running again, from preparing premises to supporting your people to ensure your business remains fully compliant.

Some features of this tailored service include:

- Remote audit of proposed reoccupation plan.
- Site Audit with report and action plan. Assessment of physical barriers, social distancing measures, provision of suitable information and training, site hygiene standards, and support for mental and physical health.
- Our Risk Management system has been updated to include additional COVID-19 checklists and risk assessment features. We can provide on-site or desktop help to clients to produce the required documents.

Our Risk Consultant, Nick Morrall, has carried out business review work for housing associations, distilleries, construction and manufacturing clients, food producers, office-based clients, national governing bodies and legal practices.
